If not, now's the time to learn how to use psychology to:

Don't miss out on these free

What's Under30's core message and how can we articulate it immediately when people show up so that strong leads are identified and compelled to join the community.

These 3 are good examples of immediate communication of core message. People connect instantly and understand what the content will be about, and if it's right for them.

UNDER<sup>30</sup>CEO

Perhaps consider moving the nav bar "in line" with the logo to create space, then put the tagline/core message below it. Also, is there any way to keep the same amount of ad space, but push the first 2 ads down so that readers only see your message in the first frame? Helps with relationship building. Again, don't know if this is possible w/the current set up, but it would be nice.

Would it be possible to push the ad space down further into this space, then right below the "recent/popular articles" widget, create a little mini section of "popular contributors" or "expert contributors" with small headshots (like in the recent comments widget). Then, use this as an area to connect readers to all the work that authors have done, and build a following that way. So there's a little more personal connection. Like you said, sometimes people get confused as to who's writing since all the author names are Under30 on the main page.

I think you can afford to test another sub box here. It's not too cluttered. Just copy the one from the top.

I'd like to see you guys invest in some higher quality pics.

This all doesn't happen overnight. Just something to think about as we test everything to create an even more premium brand.

If we want people to think of this on the same level as a Forbes, etc and contribute killer content we have to position ourselves that way.

If you're in startup mode, you may have had a couple of roadblocks on the way to getting your business running the way you want. Here are four of the biggest roadblocks to startup productivity and how you can overcome them:
